Those who sweat and suffer through June and July in Miami are rewarded with mangoes blushing from trees in yards, streets and strip malls. In good years, mango trees produce so much fruit that strangers give away mangoes on their lawns. Neighbors pack them in boxes to mail to loved ones. Friends offer homemade pies.

This has been a very good year.

In a relatively young, multinational city with few widely shared traditions, sharing the beloved fruit brings people together. Mangoes remind immigrants of the places they left — and help them feel that Miami, with its hodgepodge of cultures and languages, is home.
